Five-year-olds enjoy many of the same books that four year olds do. Because they have more life experiences, they can handle books that deal with a wider range of topics and situations. They will sit still for both realism and fantasy, but may need some help in distinguishing between the two. Simple nonfiction books are excellent for this age group because they are becoming more and more curious about things around them, especially their own bodies and how they work.

Continue to:

- Read to your child everyday and make sure he sees you reading. Even though your child is older and may be more involved in activities such as soccer or preschool, continue to read aloud to him. Be flexible—you can make waiting in the doctor’s office or car trips a perfect time to pull out a book and share it.

- Encourage your child to talk about the cover, the endpapers, the illustrations, and/or the story in a book. Encourage him by asking him interesting questions.
- This is also the time when you can start playing some pre-reading games:
- By this time, children will be able to identify at least some of the letters of the alphabet and may even know the sounds that go with them. Ask your child what sound the word “bus” starts with. Then ask him to think of other words that start with the “buh” sound, such as box, bath, etc.
 - Say words slowly, with a pause between syllables, e.g. “ti--ger”. Then have your child guess the word.
 - Say a compound word such as “cowboy” and ask your child what is left if you take away “cow”.
 - Make up silly words by changing the first sound in the word, e.g. milk, nilk, pilk, rilik, silk.
 - Have children draw pictures and then dictate a sentence or two about that picture. Write down what your child says. He will begin to think of himself as a writer.
